Today marks the end of one of the most impactful courses I've had at Ivey Business School at Western University—Value Investing and the Search for Value. From the moment I first read about it during my application, I knew it was a course I wanted to take. Over the past ten weeks, I've learned that in a world full of noise and distractions, the ability to focus and put in the effort to do thorough analysis is incredibly valuable.

Value investing is not just about finding undervalued stocks; it's a mindset that applies to life. It teaches patience, the importance of continuous learning, and the value of rational thinking. The deeper I get into value investing, the more I understand the importance of hard work, discipline, and due diligence, especially when facing uncertainty.

I'm truly grateful to George Athanassakos, Professor of Finance, Ben Graham Chair in Value Investing, and Founder & Managing Director of the Ben Graham Centre for Value Investing, for his outstanding teaching and guidance. A big thank you also to my amazing teammates: Mike Hockin, P. Eng., Nico Mendoza, P.Eng., and Andrew Shepherd.
